Nearly one hundred ballots were taken bethe Auburn district as it was constituted when Mr. Woodin represented it in the Senate we all know. A large Republican majority dwindled down to a narrow margin of a few hundred votes, and finally, in 1877, he did not even live, as a candidate, through the campaign. Tweed's testimony confirming the strong popular conviction that he had been Tweed's Senator and had taken Tweed's money drove him from the field, and the district was only saved by the choice of another name.

> Greedy Half-Breeds Never Unite. The chief ground of the new confidence of the Conkling leaders that there will not be an election so soon as was expected is undoubtedly their belief that the Administration men cannot unite. The history of past party fights makes it easy for them to believe this. The anti-machine Republicans have not been in the habit of agreeing. They could not consolidate upon any one candidate for Governor in the convention of 1879, but went into it in half a dozen different detachments, all fighting each other. The same thing was seen in the senatorial contest last January. There were three or more anti-machine candidates, and the friends of each insisted upon their man. There was no union, and the result was a prompt defeat. The Conkling men think they see the same thing in this contest. They saw the anti-Conkling vote yesterday and to-day divided up among twenty candidates for the two terms, while their own vote, small as it is, is fixed upon two candidates. They believe they see the same reconcilable elements in the Administration party that have existed there in times past. They count upon a failure to unite. This would of necessity prolong the struggle, perhaps until a time came when an adjournment would be welcomed by men who would now oppose it.
